Just because Lightroom is free does not mean it is anything other than a simple image organizer. It does not have many of the powerful features in other PS products. This is because Adobe is both a competitor and Adobe has its own photo editing software. When you purchase CS you are not just paying for the products, but for the ability to create, manipulate and distribute creative works. For this reason, it is not very good to compare a Lightroom product to other PS products. But the average person that just picks it up to edit their pictures is not a designer. They just want a simple editing program. There are already much better free image editing programs (brasero is the best ones). Edit: I just want to clarify something. I do not believe that either of these products that are Adobe's are right or wrong. My question is whether or not people should pay for them. Let's say you don't want to use the CC version of Lightroom. Are there legal alternatives to Lightroom for free? (Paint.NET, microsoft Expression, etc). If people do not give money for it, will the company go out of front to make money, or will they just stop producing it and make a price drop? Things like these are things one should consider before using these types of products. I'm not bashing Lightroom or Photoshop or that the company is in the right.
